

Women's History Month is just the beginning

When we started out over 40 years ago, our goal was simply to use women's history as a means to promote women as leaders and influential forces in our society. Women's History Month didn't exist yet. Ours was a year-long approach.

And it still is.

Women's History Month is important. It is a national celebration of the countless women who have contributed to American history, and who continue to drive social change.

In 1980, only 3% of the content in textbooks was devoted to women. In 2017, that number had only grown to 24%. We still have a long way to go.

The enduring goal of the NWHM is to make history accurate by continuing to recognize, honor, and celebrate the achievements of American women all year.

We hope you will join us!

Monumental Women's Toolkit for Change

Just in time to help continue promoting women's history, Monumental Women has announced the publication of their new Toolkit for Change aimed at helping communities honor more women and people of color in their public spaces.

Their all-volunteer non-profit Board has combined their experience and expertise to describe issues other groups will likely encounter and suggest actions communities can take in their efforts to successfully pay tribute to the women who helped create and inspire those communities.

Drawing on lessons learned during their 7-year truly historic effort to unveil the first statue honoring real women, the Women's Rights Pioneers Monument, in Central Park on August 26, 2020, the Toolkit includes topics such as:

- incorporation
- accounting
- budgeting
- fundraising
- public relations/social media
- establishing partnerships
- researching and developing women's history content
- creating an education campaign
- inspiring youth activism

Written from a variety of perspectives by Monumental Women board members who were intimately involved with the steps needed to complete its first major public art project, the Toolkit describes tasks and considerations that any project will need to anticipate – useful as both a roadmap and a checklist.
